

KEEPING IT REAL

STOP EMAILING EXPIRED LISTINGS. MAIL THEM.

A $150M producer says a packet in the mailbox gets the callback an email never does.

HE SENDS A FEDEX
PACKET, NOT A
FIFTH PHONE CALL.

A Colorado agent with $150 million in career sales says the tactic that turns expired listings into new business isn't another follow-up. It's something the seller can hold.

THE PACKET DOES WHAT THE TENTH CALL CAN'T.

On the Keeping It Real Podcast, Justin Black, a real estate advisor at Liv Sotheby's International Realty in Breckenridge, Colorado, with $150 million in career sales, said his move on an expired listing is a physical FedEx package: a market analysis and a plain, written audit of why the home didn't sell, sent straight to the seller's door. Every other agent chasing that listing is sending an email or leaving a voicemail. A package that shows up by mail is the one thing in the pile the seller actually opens, and it proves the agent already did the homework before asking for the listing back.

BUILD THE EXPIRED-LISTING PACKET THIS WEEK:

- 1 Pull the expired MLS sheet.
Days on market, every price cut, and how many showings it
- 2 actually got.
- 3 Write a one-page, plain-language reason it didn't sell.
Price, condition, or exposure. Say
- 4 which one. Don't hedge it.
- 5 Attach a current market analysis.
What actually sold nearby this quarter, and for how much,
- 6 not what the seller wants to hear.
- 7 FedEx it to the seller's door.
No call first. No email first. Let the packet be the thing
- 8 that opens the conversation.

THE TAKEAWAY

EVERYONE CALLS
THE EXPIRED
LISTING. SEND SOMETHING INSTEAD.

The packet gets opened on the counter. The tenth call gets declined on the screen.
