

KEEPING IT REAL

TWO YEARS OF VIDEOS. ZERO DEALS.

This year the same YouTube channel closed $65 million. Here's what she had in place before video one.

"YOUR FIRST
VIDEOS ARE GOING TO SUCK."

Real estate agent Sarah Maslowski says it anyway.
Her channel just closed $65 million and 50 clients,
all from YouTube.

SHE REMOVED THE DECISION BEFORE SHE NEEDED TO MAKE IT.

Maslowski committed to three months of weekly videos before she filmed the first one, no matter how few views came back. And she made a rule before she had a single subscriber: if she didn't have an editor, she wasn't putting out a video. Both decisions happened before the empty view counts showed up, which is the only time a decision like that gets made cleanly. Two years in, the channel that had earned nothing put five deals under contract in one month while she was on vacation in Europe.

BEFORE YOU POST YOUR FIRST VIDEO:

- 1 Set a hard runway before you film video one.
"I was going to at least try this for three months before I gave up" is a decision made once, not renegotiated every week the views stay flat.
- 2 Hire an editor before you need one.
Maslowski's rule from day one: no editor, no video. Removing her own out kept a bad week from becoming a missed week.
- 3 Bank two or three videos before launch.
She had videos ready to go before her first upload, so one slow week never showed up as a gap on the channel.
- 4 Put a scheduling link in place once leads start calling.
She runs it through Go High Level so a lead who calls in doesn't turn into a week of back-and-forth on a calendar.

THE TAKEAWAY

THE SYSTEM OUTLASTS THE SLOW START.

Set the runway and the editor before you film video one. The views come later.
