THE DAY THE TEXTS STOPPED.

It was the day after closing. Here's what that silence actually costs you.

EVERYONE HUGS
AT THE TITLE
COMPANY. THEN
THE AGENT
VANISHES.

The SOLD photo goes up, the commission clears, and the client is left to sort out the utility transfer and the missing garage remotes on their own.

MOST AGENTS TREAT THE CLOSING TABLE AS THE FINISH LINE.

88 percent of buyers say they would use their agent again, per the NAR 2025 Profile of Home Buyers and Sellers. That number is the ceiling, not a guarantee. It measures how buyers feel right after a good experience, not whether the agent stayed in touch long enough to collect on it. An agent who goes quiet the day the keys change hands is spending down that goodwill with every week of silence, and a past client who cannot reach you does not wait around to find out if you're busy. They call somebody else next time.

SAY THIS BEFORE YOU HAND OVER THE KEYS, THEN KEEP IT:

- 1 Tell them the job doesn't end today, out loud, at the table.
"Anything comes up with the
- 2 house, the utilities, the seller, you call me first." Said once, remembered for years.
- 3 Send a 48-hour check-in.
Did the movers show up, is the water on, is anything broken you
- 4 didn't expect. Thirty seconds, and it's the first proof the promise was real.
- 5 Put a 30-day follow-up and a 1-year note on the calendar right now, before the next closing
- 6 buries it. The note that arrives on the anniversary of their closing is the one they forward
- 7 to a friend who's selling.

THE TAKEAWAY

BEFORE YOU LEAVE
TODAY'S CLOSING
TABLE, PUT TWO DATES ON YOUR CALENDAR: A
30-DAY CHECK-IN
AND A 1-YEAR
NOTE.

The commission clearing is not the moment you stop existing to that client. It's the moment that decides whether they call you again.
